Selected Court Decisions Citing Research

Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263 (1999) (United States Supreme Court).

Justice Souter, concurring in part and dissenting in part: "What is more important, common experience, supported by at least one empirical study, see Bowers, Sandys, & Steiner, Foreclosed Impartiality in Capital Sentencing: Jurors' Predispositions, Guilt-Trial Experience, and Premature Decision Making, 83 Cornell L.Rev. 1476, 1486-1496 (1998), tells us that the evidence and arguments presented during the guilt phase of a capital trial will often have a significant effect on the jurors' choice of sentence" (p. 305).

Summerlin v. Stewart, (2003) 341 F.3d 1082 (UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT)

Judge Rawlison, dissenting: The Capital Jury Project, funded by the National Science Foundation, is an empirical study of "death penalty decision making by jurors." . . . [M]ost of the jurors who indicated a stand on punishment at the guilt stage of the trial said they were "absolutely convinced" of their early stands on punishment and adhered to them throughout the course of the trial. William J. Bowers, Marla Sandys, and Benjamin D. Steiner, Foreclosed Impartiality in Capital Sentencing: Jurors' Pre-dispositions, Guilt -- Trial Experience, and Premature Decision Making, 83 Cornell L. Rev. 1476, 1477 (1998).

United States of America v. Mikos, WL 22110948 (2003) (N.D. Illinois, Eastern Division).

Guzman, J., Memorandum Opinion and Order, fn 6: "Mikos discusses several statistical studies concerning the death penalty," including: William J. Bowers and Benjamin Steiner, Death by Default: An Empirical Demonstration of False and Forced Choices in Capital Sentencing, 77 TEXAS L.REV. 605 (1999).

People v. LaValle, N.E.2d (June 24, 2004) (Court of Appeals of New York).

G.B. Smith, J., opinion, under "III. PENALTY PHASE": Studies have found that jurors tend to "grossly underestimate how long capital murderers not sentenced to death usually stay in prison" (Bowers & Steiner, Death by Default: An Empirical Demonstration of False and Forced Choices in Capital Sentencing, 77 Tex L Rev 605, 648 [Feb 1999]).

State v. Dellinger, 79 S.W.3d 458 (May 7, 2002) (Supreme Court of Tennessee, Eastern Section, at Knoxville).

Extensive proof demonstrates, however, that misunderstandings and misinformation about the law often sway the sentencing decisions of capital juries. Evidence gathered in the Capital Jury Project, a leading study of capital juries upon which this Court has relied in past cases, 2 indicates that a majority of jurors "grossly underestimate how long capital murders not sentenced to death usually stay in prison," and the jurors who hold such erroneous beliefs are "far more likely to vote for death." William J. Bowers and Benjamin Steiner, Death by Default: An Empirical Demonstration of False and Forced Choices in Capital Sentencing, 77 TEXAS L.REV. 605 (1999).

McKinney v. Arizona, 139 S. Ct. 2692, 204 L. Ed. 2d 1089 (June 10, 2019) (Counsel for Arizona Capital Representation Project brief argued before the United States Supreme Court)

Research into jury decision making has demonstrated that jurors vote for life because of mitigation including dysfunctional and traumatic childhoods, mental illness, remorse, and poverty. The bulk of this research was performed by the Capital Jury Project (CJP). CJP is a long-term research project that began in 1991 with support from the National Science Foundation. Over the last 25 years, the CJP has conducted 1198 in-depth interviews with jurors from 353 capital trials over 14 states. "[T]he CJP was designed to: (1) systematically describe jurors' exercise of capital sentencing discretion; (2) assess the extent of arbitrariness in jurors' exercise of such discretion; and (3) evaluate the efficacy of capital statutes in controlling such arbitrariness." University at Albany School of Criminal Justice, What is the Capital Jury Project, <http://www.albany.edu/scj/13189.php> (last accessed March 25, 2019).
